

I am very pleased with the Indiana law called the Do Not Call rule. It has eliminated the very objectionable calls I used to get. If the FCC is considering undermining this existing law with a watered down federal version, I am very much against it. I do not want these calls at my home. Anything less than the Indiana law is unacceptable. For a direct marketer to interrupt my peace and quiet of my home by claiming I am an existing customer is just plain BS. If the federal government can't do as good of a job as Indiana does, I want no part of it.

sincerely,

Terry Pearson
